Cara Cara
Oranges

Extremely sweet and low in acid, cara cara navel oranges also have higher vitamin A and C content than standard navel oranges. Cara cara navels have a round shape and a bright orange skin like a traditional orange. Their flesh, though, is pink and resembles the flesh of a pink grapefruit. Cara cara navels have a more complex sweet flavor than regular navels that includes a hint of raspberry.

Clementines have a host of health benefits beyond the obvious vitamin C content. Clementines are typically eaten as a snack, but they can be cross-merchandised with back-to-school items, juicing equipment and bagged salads. Clementines are the perfect size for lunch boxes.

Blood Oranges

Blood oranges are a small citrus fruit that has deep burgundy flesh, giving it its name. The juicy flesh has a rich orange flavor with raspberry and strawberry overtones and is less acidic than common oranges. It is also known as pigmented orange or sanguine. Blood oranges are available from late winter through early summer.

Tangelos are a cross between a tangerine and a pummelo. They come in a variety of sizes, from the size of a regular orange to the size of a grapefruit. Their round, orange exterior gives way to juicy, sweet orange flesh.
